THE SALVATION ARMY.

GENERAL BOOTH AND HIS CRITICS.

AN INTERLUDE BY "AUNT MARTHA."

The twenty-seventh anniversary of the Salvation Army was celebrated at Exeter Hall last evening. There was a very large meeting—platform, gallery, and body of the house being crowded. In the latter part of the proceedings there was singing, with an occasional accompaniment by the band on the platform, everybody joining in the choruses. The effect was a good one. Mrs. Booth, who presided, said he knew that this anniversary would give rise to fresh objections. There were many people who knew the Salvation Army better than he did, people who knew things about it personally that he could not have dreamed of, people who had depended on their fortunes for their livelihood. Death had never dreamed of, people who depended on their fortunes for their livelihood. Death had never dreamed of, people who depended on their fortunes for their livelihood. Death had never dreamed of, people who
